This project would not have been possible without the constant support from my family, friends, professors, and mentors who believed in me throughout this entire academic experience. I would particularly like to thank my supervisor Dr. Rutger Hagen and second reader Prof. Dr. Petr Kopecky for their guidance and patience; without your help, this thesis would not have been possible. A special thanks goes to Gijs de Jong from the KNVB and the HNS who agreed to contribute to this project, providing valuable insight into the world of human rights in football. To my friends, thank you for the proof-reading sessions, emotional support, and giving me the belief in myself, even through difficult times; may we remember memories we had together in this collective experience. Finally, to my family, thank you for believing in me and supporting me every step of this journey; I am forever grateful for your love and dedication.

This thesis is dedicated to the people who are exploited and cannot live freely under authoritarian and undemocratic regimes. May we one day live in a world where the rights of workers are respected, and people can live freely as their true selves.

Abstract

Mega sporting events (MSEs) like the Olympic Games and FIFA World Cup are seen by many as pathways for promoting human rights. While MSEs seek to promote ideals like peace and equality, there have been numerous occasions where hosts of these events undermine the same values the MSEs strive to foster. This can be seen with the most recent edition of the FIFA World Cup in Qatar with the host accused of undermining human rights controversies related to migrant labor, women's rights, and LGBTQ rights in the country. Given the phenomenon of state's reacting differently to norm contestation, the central research question this project assesses is: How did democratic states respond to human rights norm contestations at the 2022 FIFA World Cup in Qatar?

Building on literature from the schools of human rights, protests, and state responses to norm contestation, this study uses democracy level as an independent variable see its effects on state behavior at the 2022 World Cup. Using a most-similar systems design, a QCA is conducted on Croatia and The Netherlands. This study provides mixed support for realist thought that finds that the closer a state is to being a full democracy, the more likely it is to respond to a norm contesting MSE host.

Introduction:

“The power of football in society is on display every day around the world. It is a game that brings people together, inspires generations and promotes team spirit. FIFA is dedicated to harnessing this power in order to have a positive social impact.” – FIFA’s Vision 2020-2023 Report (FIFA, 2020)

Traditionally, MSEs have been viewed as avenues for promoting the collective goals of humanity (Burke, 2019). The founder of the Modern Olympic Games (Olympics), Pierre de Coubertin, described the Olympiad as having the aim of bringing “peace among nations” (Burke, 2019, pg. 89). Similarly, former UN General Secretary Kofi Annan once said “Olympic ideals are also UN ideals: tolerance, equality, fair play, and most of all peace. Together the Olympics and the UN can be a winning team” (Burke, 2019, p. 89). While MSEs have aimed to be pathways for encouraging values like human rights and equality, there have been a multitude of instances where they have enabled the contrary.

MSEs such as the Olympics and the FIFA World Cup have been, and continue to be, platforms in which states contest international human rights norms. Historically, the 1978 FIFA World Cup occurred in Argentina amid the Dirty War, a period in which thousands of Argentinians were killed at the hands of the ruling military junta (Smith, 2002). Four decades later, the 2018 FIFA World Cup was held in Russia following its increased crackdown on political opponents, journalists, and members of the LGBTQ community (Rosenburg, 2022). Even though MSEs are hosted by regimes who undermine human rights, the events they put on have not been held without scrutiny (Boykoff, 2017).

MSEs can serve as platforms for bringing attention to human rights abuses, whether they happen in the host country or in the broader international community (Boykoff, 2017). In the past, individuals and social movements used MSEs to bring attention to human rights issues, as seen with the protests of John Carlos and Tommie Smith at the 1968 Mexico City Olympics and the Mothers of Plaza de Mayo at the 1978 FIFA World Cup (Boykoff, 2017; Daanen, 2022). Similarly, states have used MSEs as avenues for protest; this includes the African-led boycott of the 1976 Montreal Olympics over apartheid and the U.S. boycott of the 1980 Moscow Olympics over the U.S.S.R. invasion of Afghanistan (Berg et al., 2012; Eaton, 2016). While no full boycotts have occurred since 1988, states continue to protest perceived injustices at MSEs (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010). In displaying their displeasure with China's treatment of Uyghurs, the U.S. led efforts to diplomatically boycott the 2022 Beijing Olympics (Mather, 2022). Similarly, countries are considering various strategies to display their displeasure with the tentative decision to allow Russian athletes to compete at the upcoming 2024 Olympiad in Paris, following the Russian state's escalated aggression in Ukraine (Sytas, 2023).

One of the most recent examples of a regime with a questionable human rights record hosting a MSE can be seen with the 2022 FIFA World Cup in Qatar. According to human rights organizations, the state of Qatar arbitrarily detains those critical of their government, the country's guardianship system curtails women's rights, and the state has explicit laws punishing LGBTQ persons (Amnesty International, 2022; HRW, 2022). Since the country was awarded the rights to the event in 2010, allegations of state-enabled systemic exploitation of migrant workers, who comprise 95% of the country's total workforce, have plagued the host (HRW, 2022). There have been many cases of migrant workers being trapped in conditions likened to modern slavery, as well as claims that Qatari authorities failed to properly investigate the deaths of thousands of these workers in the lead up to the event (Ganji, 2016).

When viewing how states responded to the human rights situation in Qatar, a series of countries took actions prior to and during the 2022 FIFA World Cup. Continuing the trend of state-backed protests at MSEs, the KNVB released a plan on how they engaged migrant workers in Qatar, while the Australian football team publicly denounced human rights conditions in the host country (KNVB, 2022; Socceroos, 2022). While some nations chose to pursue a vocal strategy, other traditionally democratic countries chose to remain quieter on issues surrounding human rights. An example of this is the French Football Federation (FFF) releasing a statement which stated, "The FFF nevertheless deplores this stigmatization campaign... we are very happy that we are coming to play in Qatar...participating does not mean turning a blind eye and endorsing (human rights abuses)" (BHRRC, 2022).

Given how much of the scholarship overlooks the role democracy plays in impacting whether states protest at MSEs, this analysis explores this research gap (Berg et al., 2012; Eaton, 2016; Koliev, 2020). For this inquiry, the specific research question it seeks to answer is: How did democratic participants respond to human rights norm contestations at the 2022 FIFA World Cup in Qatar? With the growing phenomenon of authoritarian governments using sports as a mechanism to rebrand their regimes, and an increasing disdain within democracies for hosting MSEs, this research aims to provide human rights supporters greater knowledge for how to navigate a more complex environment (Brannagan & Reiche, 2022).

Building on literature from the schools of human rights, protests, and state responses to norm contestation, this study uses democracy level as an independent variable see its effects on state behavior at the 2022 World Cup. Using a most-similar systems design, a QCA is conducted on Croatia and The Netherlands. This study provides mixed support for realist thought for the theory that the closer a state is to being a full democracy, the more likely it is to respond to a norm contesting MSE host.

Literature Review:

This chapter will begin with an examination of existing literature on why non-democratic states host MSEs, how they contest human rights norms, and how they attempt to minimize their perceived contestation. It will then discuss democracy and human rights, how states respond to human rights contestations, how actors protest at MSEs, and how states react to abuses at MSEs.

Non-Democratic States and MSEs:

A majority of the existing literature suggests that the primary reason states host MSEs is to increase their legitimacy and further their political interests (Sullivan, 2018). While states may claim that hosting a MSE will foster significant economic development, this claim has been widely contested, with recent events having significant expenditures and negligible economic returns (Müller, 2014). Within a host country, MSEs aim to foster collective emotions like national unity and pride, work towards government policy objectives, and promote the image of the state (Griffin, 2019; Brannagan & Reiche, 2022). An example of this is the 2010 World Cup elevating the South African post-apartheid social identity among South Africans (Sullivan, 2018). On an international level, a host may use a MSE as a soft power tool to project its power and national image, aiming to increase its legitimacy and standing (Brannagan & Giulianotti, 2014). Instances of this include the Argentine military junta presenting itself at the 1978 FIFA World Cup, after its coup, and Russia attempting to reinvent itself as a superpower at the 2014 Olympics (Alekseyeva, 2014; Scharpf et al., 2022). In the context of Qatar, the 2022 FIFA World Cup served to further goals such as combatting its national health crisis, increase its reputation as a trusted partner for regional, and promote key long-term projects like the Qatar National Vision 2030 (Brannagan & Giulianotti, 2014; Griffin, 2019).

While MSEs aim to promote values related to human rights, there have been multiple instances where hosts challenge these ideals and attempt to minimize their perceived contestations (Burke, 2019; Daanen, 2022). Literature suggests that states tend to not comply with norms when the cost of compliance exceeds the benefits they stand to gain from noncompliance (Keohane, 1982). Additionally, a non-democratic nation may join human rights regimes, and not adhere to its commitments, because doing so provides increased legitimacy in the international community, while obligation of treaty enforcement is rarely called into question (Hafner-Burton et al., 2008; Terman & Byun, 2022). A state may use strategies like rhetorical adaptation to minimize its perceived norm violation to lessen the negative externalities of its contestation; in the context of MSEs, states do this to avoid international scrutiny and maximize the benefits they receive from hosting events (Dixon, 2017).

Notable instances of norm contestation at MSEs are the 1978 FIFA World Cup in Argentina and the 2014 Olympics in Russia (Müller, 2014; Scharpf et al., 2022). After seizing power in a coup in 1976, the hosting Argentine military junta contested the ideals set out in the ICCPR by engaging in a campaign of forced disappearances, torture, and extrajudicial executions (UN, 1966; Knudson, 1997). Though it contested norms, the junta was intent on portraying themselves as a liberal society in the global community; to achieve its goal, the regime escalated repression against dissidents prior to the event and engaged in an extensive PR campaign in international media (Smith, 2002; Scharpf et al., 2022). Like Argentina, the Russian government contested the covenant's norms at the 2014 Sochi Winter Olympics (Müller, 2014). Prior to the event, Russia passed legislation banning "propaganda of non-traditional relations", an act curtailing LGBTQ freedom in the country, and attempted to portray it as an imaginary issue of the West (Müller, 2014; Van Rhee, 2014, p. 127).

In the process of hosting the 2022 World Cup, Qatar was accused of contesting human rights norms (Griffin, 2019). The state was alleged of undermining the ICCPR in its legal system through its stringent laws around women's rights and homosexuality (Brannagan & Reiche, 2022). Additionally, the government was accused of contesting the norms of the ILO Forced Labor Convention through its usage of the Kafala system, an institution which exposed thousands of migrant workers to conditions of forced labor, human trafficking, indefinite detention, and death (Ganji, 2016; Brannagan & Reiche, 2022). In response to the perceived contestation, Qatar acknowledged it had problems in its labor system and introduced reforms for migrant workers in 2020, years after preparations for the event had begun (Brannagan & Reiche, 2022). These reforms were in congruence with the state's larger goal of using the World Cup as a platform to provide a positive image for the country and the region (Brannagan & Giulianotti, 2014). In describing the negative coverage Qatar and the Middle East received, government officials stated, "Yes, we do have our problems, some countries more than others, but at the end of the day it's not what people make us out to be." (Brannagan & Giulianotti, 2014, p. 711).

Democracy, Human Rights, Protests, and MSEs:

Although democracy is not a precondition for a state respecting human rights, literature suggests that democratic states are less inclined to violate human rights norms within their state, when compared to their non-democratic counterparts (Landman, 2018; Joshi et al., 2019). Though definitions of democracy vary, democratic systems tend to be characterized by features such as popular sovereignty, accountable rule of law, and an independent media apparatus (Coppedge et al., 2011; Landman, 2018). The closer a state is to being a full democracy by encompassing these traits, the more likely it is to internalize human rights norms and have less incidences of human rights abuses (Mesquita et al., 2005; Cingranelli & Filippov, 2010). In democratic systems, governments are incentivized to not violate the rights of their peoples since doing so threatens their ability to maintain power (Moravcsik, 2000; Mesquita et al., 2005). Internationally, literature suggests that democratic states may support treaties and regimes promoting human rights to increase their legitimacy, satisfy the objectives of major powers, promote domestic stability by reducing the likelihood of inter-state conflict, and/or to socialize less democratic states (Moravcsik, 2000; Landman, 2018).

While democratic states have incentives to promote human rights, prior research suggests that they employ a variety of responses, ranging from condemnation, silence, and endorsement, when addressing regimes who contest these norms (Koliev, 2020; Zarpli & Zengin, 2022). A state may act unilaterally or multilaterally to admonish governments who violate norms; this may come through the most common form, “naming and shaming”, or through the usage of punitive sanctions (Hafner-Burton, 2014; Terman & Byun, 2022). “Naming and shaming” refers to a strategy in which an actor publicizes a state’s wrongdoings and urges reforms; states utilizing this approach may openly condemn an offending state in a forum such as the UN (Hafner-Burton, 2008). An example of this is when 39 countries expressed concern about “gross human rights violations” facing the Uyghur minority in China and called for an independent investigation at the UN in October 2020 (Zarpli & Zengin, 2022, p. 2). States may seek to punish norm violators through the usage of punitive measures such as economic sanctions, withholding aid, and/or the use of military force (Hafner-Burton, 2014). Instances of this include economic sanctions regimes issued against South Africa during apartheid and the 2011 NATO-led military intervention in Libya (Cardenas, 2007; Thakur, 2016). Though democratic states pursue “naming and shaming” and punishment to change the behavior of a norm violator, the improvement of human rights following these measures has been varied (Hafner-Burton, 2008; Thakur, 2016; Terman & Voeten, 2018). While a state may admonish a norm violator, they may also respond through silence or open endorsement of the contesting government's actions (Terman & Byun, 2022; Zarpli & Zengin, 2022). Examples of this are 65 countries, including established democracies, not condemning China's treatment of the Uyghurs in 2020 and the U.S. and the U.K. supporting Saudi Arabia in joining the UN Human Rights Council in 2015, despite the regime executing political prisoners (Terman & Voeten, 2018; Zarpli & Zengin, 2022). In explaining why democratic states react in various ways to contestation, literature suggests that states seek to maximize their interests by being highly critical of violations committed by their enemies and less harsh on violations committed by their allies (Terman & Voeten, 2018; Terman & Byun, 2022). The nature of the contested norm also plays a role with states addressing less "sensitive" issues when engaging with their norm contesting allies (Koliev & Lebovic, 2022; Terman & Byun, 2022). While their responses may vary, overall, democratic states are more likely to engage in "naming and shaming" initiatives against governments that violate human rights when compared to undemocratic countries (Koliev, 2020).

MSEs serve as platforms for individuals and groups to protest in support of human rights (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010). Protests are strategic actions taken by an actor aimed at influencing decision makers in contesting a policy or condition (Lipsky, 1968; Hanna et al., 2016). In the context of MSEs, protests have primarily manifested in the forms of activism by athletes and broader political movements (Boykoff, 2017). Using the heightened international attention created by the events, actors use actions like advocacy, boycotts, gestures, and non-participation to display discontent in attempts to spur change (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010; Hanna et al., 2016). Demonstrations at MSEs are not a new phenomenon; between 1896 and 2008, at least 50 unique protests occurred at the Olympic Games (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010). Historically, human rights protests at MSEs have focused on issues both within the host country and in the broader international community; these protests have had varying degrees of success (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010; Boykoff, 2017). The 1906 Athens Olympics saw Peter O'Connor protest Great Britain's colonial rule of Ireland by climbing a flagpole and replacing the Union Jack with an "Ireland Forever" flag (Boykoff, 2017). Similarly, despite government efforts to control the narrative, the Mothers of Plaza de Mayo movement gain international notoriety at the 1978 FIFA World Cup (Daanen, 2022). In the context of the 2022 World Cup in Qatar, a primary method of protest prior to the event was significant coverage by advocacy groups and western media outlets on the Qatari state's alleged human rights abuses (Brannagan & Reiche, 2022).

Similar to how they respond to norm contestations in general, literature suggests democratic states may use MSEs to act unilaterally or multilaterally to condemn, remain silent, or endorse states who challenge human rights (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010; Berg et al., 2012). States protest issues related to the host country and the wider international society with varying degrees of success (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010). The most common form of state-led protest has been “naming and shaming”, primarily in the form of MSE boycotts (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010; Boykoff, 2017). In protest of the support Western nations provided to apartheid South Africa, a group of 28 African states boycotted the 1976 Montreal Olympics (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010). Similarly, the United States led a coalition of over 25 countries in boycotting the 1980 Moscow Olympics due to the U.S.S.R.'s invasion of Afghanistan (Berg et al., 2012; Eaton, 2016). Outside of full boycotts, states may protest while participating in an event; an example of this is when Western nations sent reduced government delegations to the 2014 Sochi Olympics following Russia's passage of anti-LGBTQ legislation (Van Rheenen, 2014).

While democratic states can protest at MSEs, they may remain silent, or even openly endorse, hosts who contest human rights norms (Berg et al., 2012). Despite calls to boycott the 2008 Olympics in Beijing over China's human rights record, countries like the U.S. sent full delegations to the event (Berg et al., 2012). During the 1978 World Cup, democratic states like The Netherlands provided arms assistance to the Argentine junta, directly assisting in the Dirty War (Daanen, 2022). While research has not looked specifically at the role of democracy, existing literature suggests that state responses at MSEs are influenced by states' attempts to maximize their interests (Berg et al., 2012).

Addressing a Research Gap:

While there has been a multitude of studies exploring the relationship between democracy and human rights (Mesquita et al., 2005; Cingranelli & Filippov, 2010; Koliev, 2020), as well as a plethora of research analyzing protests and state responses to human rights abuses at MSEs (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010; Berg et al., 2012; Eaton, 2016), there has been little examination into how a state's level of democracy impacts its response to human rights violations at MSEs. Additionally, given the recency of the 2022 Qatar World Cup, and the Qatari state's alleged contestation of human rights norms (Griffin, 2019; Brannagan & Reiche, 2022), there has been little analysis conducted regarding state behavior at this event. Given this research gap, this study will explore the responses of democratic states at the 2022 FIFA World Cup based on their levels of democracy.

Theoretical Framework:

To explore the research gap, this chapter will introduce the realist school of thought as a theory to explain state behavior at MSEs. It will then conceptualize democracy level as an explanatory variable to interpret state actions within realism, as well as conceptualizing other core definitions. The chapter will then conclude with a presentation of testable hypotheses.

Theoretical Arguments:

When explaining whether states decide to protest at a MSE, the primary theory used to interpret their behavior is realism (Berg et al., 2012; Eaton, 2016). In political science, realism is a concept in which states seek to maximize their power within an anarchic international system in the absence of an effective legal authority above states (Mearsheimer, 1994; Lake, 2010). Within the realist school, states act as rational actors to enlarge their relative power and further their interests; in a broad sense, power can be viewed as the ability of a state to determine its own circumstances and outcomes when interacting with other states (Morgenthau, 1978; Barnett & Duvall, 2005). A narrow interpretation of realism suggests that powerful states create supernational institutions to secure their preferences; international organizations act on the behest of powerful states, primarily the global hegemonies, and smaller states are subservient to those more powerful (Mearsheimer, 1994; Lake, 2010).

Realist thought has been used to explain the behavior of both powerful and less powerful states at MSEs (Berg et al., 2012; Eaton, 2016). In describing the rationale behind the U.S.' 1980 Olympic boycott, Berg et al. (2012) contends that the Carter administration decided that it would be of greater value for U.S. to respond to the U.S.S.R's invasion of Afghanistan through "an unambiguous statement of our national resolve" than attend the MSE (Berg et al., 2012, p.13). Conversely, they use realist thought to explain that despite human rights concerns, the U.S. avoided a boycott for the 2008 Chinese Olympics to preserve ties with their top economic partner (Berg et al., 2012). In describing how less powerful states protest at MSEs, Eaton (2016) argues that non-democratic China and the Philippines went along with the U.S. led 1980 Olympic boycott to increase the legitimacy and security they received from the U.S. hegemony (Eaton, 2016).

While realist thought may explain how states seek to maximize their interests, a narrow interpretation of realism does not adequately explain the power of MSE organizing federations and the agency of less powerful states in protesting at MSEs (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010). FIFA and the IOC have the power to apply sanctions against states who go against their norms; this can be seen with the bans of Germany and other defeated WW1 countries at the 1920 Antwerp Olympics and the multi-year Olympic bans of Rhodesia and South Africa over state-led discrimination (Cottrell & Nelson, 2010; Boykoff, 2017). Going against the actions of the U.S. and U.S.S.R. hegemonies, 28 African nations boycotted the 1976 Montreal Olympics to protest the apartheid system in South Africa (Boykoff, 2017). Given these limitations, this study will apply realism through a broader interpretation and view it as states acting as rational actors to further their interests in the anarchic international system (Morgenthau, 1978; Barnett & Duvall, 2005).

Through this lens, realism has also been used to explain democratic state behavior when responding to norm contestations (Koliev, 2020; Terman & Byun, 2022). Traditionally, realist scholars explained state responses to contestation, whether it be condemnation, silence, or endorsement, as states maximizing their interests by admonishing adversaries and codling allies (Hafner-Burton, 2008; Zarpli & Zengin, 2022). While this framework is generally supported, it fails to account for instances in which states critique their partners. Terman & Byun (2022) provide nuance to this theory by proposing that issue sensitivity influences state responses and that states will address less sensitive issues with partners to maximize the benefits they receive from their relationships and through the promotion of human rights (Terman & Byun, 2022). Koliev expands on realist frameworks by exploring how the level of democracy influences state responses and suggests that democratic states are more likely to engage in “naming and shaming” behavior against norm violators than non-democracies (Koliev, 2020). Through using a broad lens of realism, and building on Koliev’s exploration, this study will explore how a state’s level of democracy influences their response in the context of MSEs.

Conceptualizing Democracy Level and Core Definitions:

The independent variable that will be used for this exploration is the democracy level of a state. In a broad sense, democracy is a system of government that is ruled by the will and consent of its people; the closer a state is to achieving this goal, the closer it is to being a full democracy (Coppedge et al., 2011; Landman, 2018). To conceptualize democracy and democracy level, the 2022 Freedom House Democracy Index and the 2022 EIU Democracy Index are used. These indexes were selected given their wide usage by political scientists in studying democracy, their classification of states based on transparent and systemic methodologies, and the recency in which these indexes have been updated (Coppedge et al., 2011; Landman, 2018). To establish if a state can be considered a democracy, the Freedom House Index is utilized. It categorizes states as “free”, “partly free”, and “not free” based on 25 indicators related to political rights and civil liberties; for this study, a state will be classified as a democracy if it is “free” (Repucci & Slipowitz, 2022). To conceptualize and operationalize democracy level, EIU’s index is used; EIU assigns states a score between 0-10 based on metrics such as electoral process, government function, and civil liberties (EIU, 2023). A state is assigned a categorization of “full democracy”, “flawed democracy”, “hybrid regime”, and “authoritarian” based on their scores, with “full democracy” and “flawed democracy” states being considered democratic (EIU, 2023). This study will compare democracies that are “full” and “flawed” to see how they responded to Qatar’s norm contestation.

EIU Definitions of Democracy Level (EIU, 2023, p. 67)

| Term | Definition | Score (0 to 10) |
|-------------------------|---|----------------------------|
| Full Democracy | “Countries in which not only basic political freedoms and civil liberties are respected, but which also tend to be underpinned by a political culture conducive to the flourishing of democracy. The functioning of government is satisfactory. Media are independent and diverse. There is an effective system of checks and balances. The judiciary is independent and judicial decisions are enforced. There are only limited problems in the functioning of democracies.” | 8.00 to 10.00 |
| Flawed Democracy | “These countries also have free and fair elections and, even if there are problems (such as infringements on media freedom), basic civil liberties are respected. However, there are significant weaknesses in other aspects of democracy, including problems in governance, an underdeveloped political culture and low levels of political participation.” | 6.00 to 7.99 |

Given the broad scope of human rights norms, for this assessment they are viewed under the purviews of the ICCPR and the ILO Forced Labor Convention (no.29). With norms being “standards of appropriate behavior for actors with a given identity”, these treaties can be classified as such for states since they are ratified by most nations (Dixon, 2017, p. 85; ILO, 2022; OHCHR, 2023). The Covenant focuses on themes that individuals should not be denied certain fundamental rights based on t factors defining one’s identity; the Convention prescribes that individuals should not be subjected to forced labor in most circumstances (ILO, 1930; UN, 1948). These are the norms of focus given the Qatari state’s contestation of both treaties with their policies related to migrant workers, women, and LGBTQ peoples prior to/during the 2022 World Cup (Griffin, 2019).

For this study, the idea of protest will be conceptualized using three dimensions (political, social, and targeted). In a broad sense, protests are strategic actions taken by an actor aimed at influencing decision makers in contesting a policy or condition (Lipsky, 1968; Hanna et al., 2016). Since protests occur in a variety forms, this definition will be broken down into three components to see if an action can be classified as a protest. These components are based on the seminal work on protests from Lipsky (1968), as well as research from Cottrell & Nelson (2010) and Hanna et al. (2016) in interpreting protests within and outside of MSEs.

Conceptualization of Protest Components

| Component | Definition |
|------------------|---|
| Political | A protest displays an opinion towards a relevant actor. |
| Social | A protest comments on a specific social policy or condition. |
| Targeted | A protest in targeted towards a specific actor to elicit a change in a policy or condition. |

For this study, the behavior of a democratic state will be viewed through the actions of their respective football associations, with attention also paid to their media apparatuses. In general, a state may cede power to an institution to manage its everyday interactions regarding a particular subject; in the context of MSEs, this responsibility is delegated to a state's respective sporting association (Abbott & Snidal, 1998; Eaton, 2016). Though associations have varying levels of autonomy, they tend to act in line with their governments' policy positions and comply with the legal directives of the states in which they operate, as seen with national associations complying with directives to boycott various MSEs (Berg et al., 2012; Eaton, 2016). For this reason, the actions of a state will be viewed through the lens of their respective football associations when evaluating behavior at the 2022 World Cup.

Additionally, focus will be given to how the media apparatuses cover the MSE, due to the role media plays within democracies (McCombs & Valenzuela, 2022). A free and independent media ecosystem is considered an essential trait of a democracy; in democratic states, mass media has a strong and direct ability to influence what issues the public thinks about through its agenda-setting ability, impacting public policy debates (McCombs & Shaw, 1972; Coppedge et al., 2011). Agenda-setting is present in the coverage of human rights, protests, and MSEs within democratic societies, including discussions around the 2022 World Cup (Hafner-Burton, 2014; Brannagan & Reiche, 2022). Through its coverage of a MSE, media can influence perceptions regarding a norm contesting host and influence a state's agenda (Van Rheenen, 2014; Daanen, 2022). Though media is independent of the state, its effects on democratic state agendas and MSE perception is why it will be analyzed for this exploration (Smith, 2002; McCombs & Valenzuela, 2022).

A MSE can be conceptualized as an occasion of fixed duration that attracts millions of visitors, has a large, mediated reach, and comes with high costs and impacts on the built environment and population (Müller, 2015; Boykoff, 2017). The 2022 Qatar World Cup can be classified as such given it is a FIFA World Cup (Müller, 2015; Brannagan & Reiche, 2022).

Hypotheses:

Using realism as a theoretical framework, two hypotheses focusing on a state's democracy level will be tested. The first hypothesis builds on Koliev's (2020) research suggesting that democracy level influences a state's reaction to norm contestation. The second hypothesis further expands on Koliev's theory by bringing forth the perspectives of McCombs & Shaw (1992) and Coppedge et al., (2011) by acknowledging the agenda-setting role news media play in democratic states.

H1: The closer a state is to being a full democracy, the more likely it will protest a MSE host contesting human rights norms.

H2: The closer a state is to being a full democracy, the more likely there is to be protest coverage about a MSE in a norm-contesting state.

Methodology:

This chapter will begin by introducing a qualitative most similar systems design (MSSD) used to compare two different-leveled democracies (The Netherlands and Croatia). The section will then discuss content analysis and the data collection methods used in this study. This chapter will then conclude by discussing the coding framework and study limitations.

Case Selection:

To examine the role democracy level played in influencing state behavior at the 2022 FIFA World Cup, a MSSD method was selected. At its core, a MSSD assumes that common factors between two systems are irrelevant in determining a shift in behavior; instead, any set of variables that differentiate the systems that are present during the shift can be attributed for explaining the differing behaviors (Anckar, 2008). A small-n case study MSSD was selected since it allows for extensive examination of the cases to see if democracy level influences behavior when other potential extraneous variables remain relatively similar between the two systems (Meckstroth, 1975).

For the initial case selection process, countries were filtered from the initial 32 tournament participants to 19 based on their scores for democracy and their legal acceptance of human rights norms (see appendix a for full case selection) (Freedom House, 2022; ILO, 2022; EIU, 2023; OHCHR, 2023). With a state MSSD comparison, it is impossible to keep every potential explanatory variable constant given the limited number of countries in the world, a condition compounded at the World Cup (Meckstroth, 1975; Anckar, 2008). To mitigate this factor, variables such as relative economic relationship with Qatar, football ranking prior to the tournament, human rights commitments, and region were selected to minimize this condition. These categories were since they consider the level of partnership a state has with Qatar, its sporting expectations for the tournament, its legal commitment to human rights, and its regional similarity. After considering these factors, The Netherlands (full democracy) and Croatia (flawed democracy) were selected for the MSSD given their similarities on most metrics and contrast with democracy level (FIFA, 2022; OEC, 2022a; OEC, 2022b; COE, 2023). Since both states fulfilled the initial criteria for democracy and human rights commitments, as well as participating in the 2022 World Cup, they can be considered typical cases for the area of study.

Table 3:Most-Similar Case Comparison

| Variable | Croatia | The Netherlands |

Methods of Data Collection and Analysis:

To investigate democratic state behavior at the 2022 World Cup, an examination of Croatia’s (HNS) and the Netherlands’ (KNVB) football associations and media landscapes is conducted. This inquiry provides insights into whether a state protested Qatar’s alleged norm contestations and creates a picture into public debates in each country.

The primary method of inquiry for this MSSD is a QCA. At its core, content analysis is a form of textual analysis designed to extrapolate meaning from communication in a fixed manner; it can be viewed as an objective and systematic approach designed to assess content and construct meaning (Schreier et al., 2019). QCA is appropriate for this study since it provides a guided approach for synthesizing large amounts of contextual data through the usage of themes (Schreier, 2012). This method was also deemed appropriate given its ability to interpret various mediums of data in a standardized way, providing a high degree of flexibility (Schreier, 2012).

To examine the first hypothesis, the QCA will focus on responses from the KNVB and the HNS. This is done through an analysis of official documents, interviews, and social media data from each association. Semi-structured interviews, alongside documents, can provide an insider perspective into the workings of an association and thus were selected (Leech, 2002). Given the sensitivity of human rights issues, sampling for interviews was conducted in consultation with the respective associations. Official documents were sampled via the respective association websites and through the BHRRC's publicly available statement database. Social media was selected as a medium of analysis given platforms' ability to facilitate the presentation of emotional and motivation contents to promote or oppose protests (Jost et al., 2018). To sample this data, all publicly available posts from the official Facebook, Instagram, and Twitter association accounts were analyzed from the period of October 18, 2022, to January 18, 2023. This timeline was selected since it encompassed the three-month period prior to, during, and after the MSE, providing a picture of how state behavior changed over the course of the event.

To evaluate the second hypothesis, a QCA is conducted of select Dutch and Croatian news outlets. For sampling, three news outlets from each nation were analyzed, two that focused primarily on news and one that focused on sport given the nature of the research. For this analysis, online news media was chosen based on the accessibility of its information. Outlets were selected based on their relevancy within their country's media ecosystem and the accessibility of their databases (Bakker & Vasterman, 2007; Buric, 2007). The sources chosen were NOS, ESPN NL, and RTL for The Netherlands and Večernji List, Sportnet, and N1 for Croatia. Articles sampled were from October 18, 2022, to January 18, 2023, to provide a holistic picture of how the MSE was covered. To guide this exploration, a series of keywords were generated based on their applicability to the research area; all articles in the stated timeline with these keywords were assessed, with the coding framework providing a filter for relevancy and further analysis.

Key Terms for Media Analysis

| Country | Key Terms Used |
|-----------------|--|
| The Netherlands | English: “Qatar”, “Qatar World Cup”, “2022 World Cup”, “FIFA” Dutch: “KNVB”, “Katar”, “Katar Wereldbeker”, and “Oranje” |
| Croatia | English: “Qatar”, “Qatar World Cup”, “2022 World Cup”, “FIFA”, “Croatian National Football Team” Croatian: “HNS”, “Katar”, “Katar Svjetski Kup”, and “Vatreni” |

Given that many of the sources for both analyses were written in Croatian and Dutch, Google Translate was used to analyze non-English data. Though it is usually reliable, to mitigate the risk of inaccuracies, native speakers of the languages were consulted, and a second translation system (Bing Translate) was used.

Coding Framework:

In a QCA, coding frameworks are systemic ways to sort data and construct meaning (Schreier, 2012). For this study, three thematic dimensions are used based on the conceptualization of protest; the respective subcategories are influenced on theories related to state interests at MSEs, definitions of human rights, and the overall context of the Qatar World Cup (Schreier, 2012; Brannagan & Reiche, 2022). After using the broad categories and subcategories to filter data for relevancy, an inductive strategy was applied to create indicators (Schreier, 2012).

Table 5:Coding Framework

| Dimension | Subcategories | Indicators |
|------------------|---|--------------------------|
| Political | Croatian Pride, Dutch Pride, Qatari Identity, Qatar Contestation | |
| Social | Labor Rights, LGBTQ Rights, Womens' Rights, Racial Discrimination | OneLove, Migrant Workers |
| Targeted | FIFA, Qatari Government, Dutch Government, Croatian Government, KNVB, HNS | |

- Political: This dimension focuses on the perception of the MSE host and the participating states. Political, in this context, refers to a protest eliciting an opinion towards a specific actor (Lipsky, 1968). With the primary actors being states, this category focuses on how they are perceived at the MSE. Positive opinions can improve a state's reputation while negative opinions have the opposite effect (Sullivan, 2018). Given this, subcategories will focus on Croatian Pride and Dutch Pride, while categorizing the MSE host with the positive and negative categories of Qatari Identity and Qatar Contestation.
- Social: This dimension focuses on human rights under the purviews of the ICCPR and the Forced Labor Convention. This component refers to protests commenting on specific policy or social conditions (Lipsky, 1968). At the 2022 World Cup, the conditions in focus relate to Qatar's alleged contestations (Brannagan & Reich, 2022). Given how human rights are viewed in this study, the subcategories of Labor Rights, LGBTQ Rights, Womens' Rights, and Racial Discrimination are created. The indicators of "migrant workers" and "OneLove" are added given their prominence in data for topics related to labor and LGBTQ rights respectively.
- Targeted: This dimension refers to a protest being targeted towards a specific actor to induce a policy or social change (Lipsky, 1968). Subcategories were created based on the actors with agency at this MSE; these are the formal Croatian, Dutch, and Qatar governments, alongside FIFA, the HNS, and the KNVB within football.

Data pieces will be filtered based on their relevancy to these broad thematic categories. For a data piece to be further analyzed, their contents must discuss at least one of these three frames. Given how protests require all three of these components, a piece of data will be considered as such if it falls within the three conditions.

Study Limitations:

One limitation of the selected MSSD is the contrasting sporting results achieved at the MSE between Croatia and The Netherlands. While it is impossible to test for the counterfactual given the nature of sports, it does provide an additional lens in which to interpret the data. Another limitation is that the study uses aggregated scores to categorize democracy level; while this provides a holistic approach defining the levels, it does not look at the influence of individual indicators in affecting a state's response, an area which can be explored in further studies. An addition limitation of the MSSD is that since it looks at states operating in similar systems, in this case the European Union, there may be extraneous variables not considered that may lead to different results in other regional contexts (Anckar, 2008). In regard to QCA, it must be noted that the method requires a degree of subjectivity given that its interpretation relies primarily on the coder's framework (Schreier, 2012).

Analysis:

This analysis will begin with a brief discussion on the empirical data before evaluating each hypothesis individually.

Empirical Analysis:

Before discussing themes found in the data, this section will present results for the initial filtering of news and social media using the QCA framework. Out of a total of 2,878 articles, 282 were further analyzed for The Netherlands (9.7%), while 574 out of a potential 3,615 articles were examined for Croatia (15.8%) (please see appendix g and appendix h for full analysis). In terms of social media, 125 out of 1,200 (10.4%) were assessed for the KNVB while 126 out of 2,320 were analyzed for the HNS (5.4%) (please see appendix e and appendix f for full analysis). To increase validity of the sorting, pieces of data were coded multiple times to ensure consistency with the results (Schreier, 2012).

Hypothesis 1:

H1: The closer a state is to being a full democracy, the more likely it will protest a MSE host contesting human rights norms.

When evaluating H1, social media data displays a picture of how each association presented itself during the World Cup. The results of this analysis appear mixed as the Dutch association did engage in online protest activism, but to a minor degree in the context of its entire social media presence (14 posts out of a total 1,200). While this is more than the Croatian association, by itself it does not provide a conclusive picture on the effect of democracy level.

Chart 1 Social Media Analysis of the KNVB

Analysis of official association documents and interviews with officials also provide insight into the positions of the two states. The documents from the KNVB indicate that the association protested in favor of human rights in official statements when engaging with the norm contestation of Qatar (see appendix C). An example of this is seen in a press release prior to the World Cup in which the KNVB stated:

“We can use the current spotlight on the World Cup and make our own contribution to efforts to improve the plight of migrant workers in Qatar. We can do this through diplomacy, by supporting projects for migrant workers and women in Qatar, and especially by continuing to demand attention from the government in Qatar.” – The KNVB and The World Cup (KNVB, 2022)

An interview with the HNS’s Communication’s department provides a different commentary on human rights within the country.

“Croatian Football Federation is a sports organization, and therefore we are focusing on sporting matters first and foremost. In that regard, we focused on the World Cup in Qatar only after the team qualified for the event in November 2021, as we do with all the competitions where we participate... We also have belief that hosting the World Cup, thus opening itself to the world, and different nations and cultures, was surely useful for the human rights development in the county and the whole region.”

- Communications for the Croatian Football Federation (Appendix L)

While they may provide different perspectives on how to approach human rights in Qatar,

Hypothesis 2:

H2: The closer a state is to being a full democracy, the more likely there is to be protest coverage about a MSE in a norm-contesting state.

When evaluating the merits of this hypothesis; the data supports this claim and paints a picture of two different media landscapes. Looking at the initial data over the three-month MSE period displays an ecosystem in which the Dutch news system covered the human rights contentions of Qatar more significantly compared to the Croatian media system. Given Croatia’s made up a larger share of the articles analyzed, this disparity between all of the outlets provides a difference in the overall media landscapes of the two countries.

Media Analysis of Croatia

Conclusion:

The purpose of this thesis was to investigate how democratic states responded to the human rights norm contestations of Qatar during the 2022 World Cup. After conducting an MSSD and seeing the effect democracy level played on state response, the research finds mixed support for Koliev's (2020) initial theory that the fuller a democratic state is, the more likely they are to respond to human rights contestations in the context of MSEs. The first hypothesis present, the closer a state is to being a full democracy, the more likely it will protest a MSE host contesting human rights norms, provided mixed results after analyzing social media data, official documents, and interviews from both associations. The second hypothesis was more substantiated as there was a wide margin in the amount of coverage on issues related to human rights in The Netherlands (the fuller democracy) compared to Croatia.

When conducting this evaluation, there were a series of limitations of the data presented.

When considering future avenues of exploration, this area of research would benefit from analysis using different political science schools of thought. State-led protests at MSEs as a have been primarily evaluated in the realist school of thought; this school does not consider the agency of organizing bodies like FIFA and the IOC.

Appendix K: Ad verbatim Transcript Interview with Gijs de Jong

Interviewer (S): Shakki Bhat

Interviewee (G): Gijs de Jong

Date: April 18th, 2022

In Person or Remote: Remote (via Zoom video call) (26:25)

Language of Interview: English

Gijs de Jong works as the General Secretary for the Royal Dutch Football Association (KNVB).

Interview Purpose: The purpose of this interview is to better understand the strategy the Royal Dutch Football Association pursued regarding human rights prior to and during the 2022 FIFA World Cup. In particular, it seeks to better understand how the association publicly engaged the Qatari government and FIFA on human rights concerns ahead of the tournament.

*Interview Questions are bolded.

S: How is it going for you?

G: Good, busy, we have quite some issues in the office but doing well and preparing now for the Women's Champions League Final and preparing for the Nation's League Finals on the men's side. The competition is getting to the last phase of the competition, so Cup final next week. So, lots of exciting events coming up.

S: I got a ticket to the Women's Champions League Final which I am really excited about.

G: Good. Yeah, it will be great event. And I think what we're trying to do is to make it bigger than it was in Turin last year. So, I think we will, depending a little bit on the teams who will play but we know that in a few weeks, so there'll be good, there will be a good event.

S: So, let me give you a brief overview of the project, kind of what got me interested in it. So, the purpose of it is basically to explore how different states through their football associations respond to human rights abuses at mega sporting events. So, events like the World Cup, the Olympics, and kind of seeing throughout time different responses. So, in the case of the 1936 Nazi Olympics, countries decided not to boycott it, the 1986 Olympics, and I believe in Moscow, countries deciding to boycott. So, and now you see kind of a different approach of attending mega sporting events, but also protesting. So, kind of what is the driving factor behind why football associations and states kind of act in this way. It's kind of the main purpose of it. Yeah. So, if it's fine with you, I going to ask a series of questions, I reviewed some of your organization's documents, like the one where you laid out action steps in the lead up to the World Cup, as well as document highlighting the organization's mission and values. And the questions are going to be about that if that's fine.

G: Good.

S: Okay. So, the first one is, can you please discuss a little bit about how decisions are made in your organization? Kind of, from a structural perspective?

G: Yeah, look, we have two strong pillars. One is the amateur game. The other one is the professional game. And I think, a lot of decisions are more one level above, they are taken by the Association Board. And it's a board of three persons. Our chairman, Mr. Just Spee. One Vice President is the Director CEO for the professional game, Marianne van Leeuwen and the other one is the Director for the Amateur Game. And that's Jan Dirk van der Zee. And I'm always part of the discussions to advise them.

S: And to kind of follow up on that. When making a decision, such as your response for the World Cup, what impact does the Dutch government and private sponsors have in the decision-making process?

G: Well, you can look at it two ways, nothing and a lot. I think in the end, we are Dutch, and we make up our own mind and take our own decisions. But, of course, it is always good to discuss with your, with the government what they think. And this case was quite challenging because we didn't have a regular government because there were elections. So, they postponed their position every time, so we had to make up our mind ourselves earlier. And because we said look, we want to make up our minds before the start of the qualifiers and not afterwards. We want to take a stand before the qualifiers start. And we want to take our stand proactively and not waiting until we get questions from the media. And the same, of course, it's important what our commercial partners think, but what we said, we do it our way around. We take our position, and we will inform our commercial partners as good as we can. So, we did some webinars where we brought in people from Amnesty, from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, from the ILO, from Qatar, from the Supreme Committee, giving information and we said, look, this is the information, this is what we do. And you make up your mind yourself. So that's what we did with our commercial partners. So, it's not, some people think that we had a lot of pressure from them. Well, I think, I think our position shows that we all, we didn't have the pressure, or we didn't care about the pressure, because we took it out our own position and our commercial partners did.

S: Okay, thank you. Could you please talk a little bit about your organization mission and your values, particularly the one that your association should have a visible impact on society?

G: Yeah, that's in our new strategy, so for the for a period now 2022 to 26. But, I think if you go back 10 years ago, or like for the World Cup in 2010, in South Africa, we still said, look, we need to separate football from politics. And I think what we said now is, you can't separate that fully. And in the end the core values of our sports are the same values as human rights. Inclusiveness, everybody can participate, everybody's equal. So, these values are so close to, to the core values of our sport and the core values of our organization that you can't separate that. You can't say that something politically, what is politically about human rights? Yeah, probably everything. But it also you can say nothing, because it is what we are. And we have to stay close to our, to our core values. So, I think what changed compared to 2010, is that we now said. Look, we have to take position. And of course, in 2010, there was not a big debate about the way the process went on awarding the World Cup. Now, of course, the decision making and in 2010, for the World Cup in Qatar, was controversial. And there was already quite some controversy about labor conditions. And in Qatar, so which is directly connected to the wealth gap. So, we said we can't ignore this. And we said, we, we have to take position before the start of the qualifiers. And that's what we did.

S: Okay. And then kind of how did your organization balance competitive goals with social goals. Kind of one example, the decision not to wear the OneLove armband for instance?

G: That's maybe a little bit more difficult. I think, to start with. And that's also where we made some mistakes. So, in the end, we also make mistakes, of course. But of course, I think everybody makes mistakes every now and then. Well, I think what we do start at the end, I think what we didn't do enough, was stay connected with the world. And okay, we stand for human rights, we stand for equality, we stand for equality of the LGBTIQ+ community. But we also want to stay connected to Qatar, and to the Middle East. And in the end, I think what we wanted to do with a, with a positive pro inclusion message became an offense in the Middle East, which was not very helpful. So, so I think where we lost it was in the connection. So going back to the first part of your question, I think we always want to be connected. We are a Football Association, so, it starts with football and no discussion about playing football, we will play. We will not play Russia. So, I think a war is a clear criterion, which is non-negotiable. So, we're not going to country that is at war or who's attacking one of the other countries.

G: But having said that, we said look, we want to go there in what we call a socially aware manner. So not socially responsible, but socially aware. And we tried to find and have come up with six pillars where we could make a difference.

1. Open Dialogue: First one was open dialogue. So, we said look, we're going to talk to everybody who wants to discuss with us about this subject. With the ILO, with BWI, with amnesty, but also with the Supreme Committee, with the embassy, with our commercial partners, with FIFA, with migrant workers ourselves, which we did quite some times when we were in Qatar for BWI. So, I think that was very important pillar.
2. Open Communication: Second one was open communication. So, starting the dialogue proactively. So, I think it was already November 2019, that I went to one of the television shows on Sunday night where they evaluate competition proactively to explain our position on this. And after that, I think we've done numerous interviews, webinars, debates, podcasts, to explain position.

3. Social Program: We said the third pillar was social program. So, we have, we have WorldCoaches, which is our social program. And what we try to do, it's not big but at least it's something, we educated 75 women coaches in Qatar, to make sure that, that they can educate women players over there and to try to start a difference on their part.
4. Due Diligence: The fourth pillar was due diligence. So, we did a lot on checking our hotels, catering, transport, security, companies, and contracts. The ILO gave us a list with 10 pages of criteria, which we use for that. So there and they also when we went to our hotel, the St. Regis in Doha, they went with us to check the documents and to discuss them with the management but also with the delegation of the Workers Welfare Committee of the hotel. So, another thing that's also gave a lot of eye openers to ourselves.
5. Making a Coalition: The fifth one was making a coalition with other associations working together. So especially with the associations of Germany, Norway, Denmark, England, Wales. We worked, Belgium, we worked a lot together. But also, we had contact with US Soccer, with Australian Football Association, to see if we could work together on this part. And together with this group, with the European group, we went several times to Doha to get information.
6. Informing Our Team: And the last one and that's also connected again, a little bit to OneLove and the captain's armband was briefing, informing, our team, our players, we did it a few times. One time was still during COVID, so, it was quite strange situation where I was, together with the Dutch embassy, ambassador, in Doha. We're in front of the screen and the players who are on the other side, not very good. But the last time was good. We did it before the World Cup, and in here in the hotel in Zeist, to inform them and what we did in, in what we did, of course. Also, the statement with the first qualifier, at least the home game in The Netherlands, was a lot of comments on that and in The Netherlands saying, yeah, it was a cowardice statement. But then in the end we said look, maybe on the other end, I think we were one out of five associations who made a statement out of the 211. So at least we did something and, and what we did was, of course, a training session with the migrant workers in Doha. And what we tried to do already in the last 10 years, is at least also a symbolic statement with the team or at least an okay, you always have the discussion. Yeah, what does it help, but at least it shows that the players are aware of what's happening and in 2010, we visited Robben Island. In 2006 we went to Auschwitz and 2014 we did a clinic in the favelas of Rio. So at least to show that we know what's happening in the country, and well, at least ask attention for the situation.

So, I think this was basically our strategy for the for the World Cup, and which we tried to do between the end of 2020. And so yeah, September 2020. The document was approved in the in the board. And we try to execute it until end of 2022. And we're still busy today, with everything connected to it, because we still connected with fundraising we did with selling, doing an auction of the shirts of the players. So, we raised almost 400,000 euro, which now together with the Dutch trade union we try to spend in Doha to support migrant workers over there, for a short introduction.

S: Thank you. Very good, insightful. Another question I have is how did your relationship with FIFA and UEFA kind of impact your overall strategy, especially at times when it didn't necessarily align?

G: I think the relation of FIFA is, well we are one of the founding fathers of FIFA together with six other associations in Madrid in 1904. We had quite a difficult relationship after 2010 after awarding the World Cup to Qatar and awarding to Russia. We withdrew ourselves a little bit from the international stage because we were fed up by everything happening in Zurich, I think after Blatter leaving after the, well thanks to your FBI, cleaning up FIFA, we came back in in 16/17. I think we've seen a few good reforms, but in the process and in the build up into the World Cup, I think FIFA could have done better and we try to push them for it. We try to discuss with them through the UEFA Working Group. I think on the on the labor rights issue. In the end, we had quite a good, good collaboration. In the end. I think on the LGBTIQ+ OneLove a thing that exploded. And I think on both sides, we made mistakes. And we didn't do what we should do in finding solutions. And that all came together and in the decision of FIFA on the day before the day of the first match. To not allow the armband and we withdrew our initiative to wear the armband; I think that was bad. And after that, we went to FIFA in the end of February. To discuss this. We both sides acknowledge that we could have done better and agree that we should do better and that that football doesn't. It's not helped by these kinds of discussions in the media and yeah, this kind of collaboration.

S: One other question I have is kind of where we are Federation's expectations heading into the World Cup. Realistically, like in terms of football performance?

G: To be honest, I think we were convinced that we could compete and on the highest level and of course, we understand that countries like France, Brazil, Argentina, are strong competitors and that to beat them we need all our players. We need Virgil van Dijk to be there, we need Frenkie de Jong to be there, we need Memphis Depay to be there and they also have to be in a good shape. Well, I think we all knew that, that that Virgil was not in his best shape when he started. Frenkie also not directly in the best shape. And Memphis also not didn't play a lot. But okay, we had I think one of our biggest assets was our coach who did a great job and was very professional, very experienced and letting players believe that they could do it. So, in the end, at a World Cup, look in 2014 nobody expected us to do well. And in the end, we were third after the tournament. So, you don't have to, after the group stage, you don't have to be in a great shape to come far. So, you should always be convinced what you can do and also what you can't do. But we, of course, the coach wanted us to win it. We do. And I think we could have won it if we were in a better shape. And in the end we were not but I think reaching to the last eight was not bad and was exactly our position at the time. It was our position at the ranking. Now we ranked six. So not too bad.

S: The final interview question I have is kind of a two-parter. One, who do you think should take the lead in promoting human rights at global sporting events? And at what stage? And then the other part is, did your approach change from when the World Cup was first awarded to the months leading up to it? And what caused the change? And was there any point where it was like we should boycott or whatever?

G: Maybe you start with the last part and then you have to repeat the first question. But the last part was, I think it changed a lot. When it was awarded, we were furious, because we were also one of the bidding nations together with Belgium. I think that everybody thought, how is this possible, that if you award two World Cups there, and it's Qatar and Russia, that is crazy. If you look at all the other bids, I think, well, also, again, FBI and a lot of the investigations showed that it was not a clean process. So, I think for us, we were really disappointed. And I said we have withdrawn ourselves for quite some time from the international stage. Of course, we went to the congresses, but that was the only thing we did. And for the rest, we thought I'm not going to say to that word, but let's stay away from them.

G: In 2014, when our association was at a 125-year anniversary, we had a gift from FIFA and UEFA. And the gift was the Pact of Amsterdam, where we said you should include human rights in your bidding procedures. At that time, [Sepp] Blatter and [Michel] Platini, they didn't care too much. But after the leadership changed, both [Aleksander] Čeferin and [Gianni] Infantino, they included it in the criteria for the World Cup. So, I think that was for us a very important step. I think it should be executed even better, but okay, at least it was good step. Then the leadership changed. I think also on the FIFA side, I think what Infantino did on bringing the decision to the Congress, making it a democratic decision, making it a transparent decision. I think that was good. I think he did well, also on killing the Executive Committee and bringing in the Council. I think he did good on finance bringing more money to the associations instead of only keeping it in FIFA. So that was good. And that also brought us back a little bit to the stage. And we had quite some turbulent times in our association when, when we did qualify for the Euros in France and for the World Cup in Russia.

G: We had also, again, all governance, investigations, a new structure. And one of the changes we made, we said we need again a general secretary. So, in this case, me was fully focused on the international context and on the international relations to make sure that we because if you're not happy with FIFA, you should engage and try to make it better and not stay away. So, we changed our position. So, and that's also very important for our strategy. So, when we took the decision in September 2020, what to do? We said, look, we have three choices. We can boycott it, the World Cup, we can go there and do nothing, or we can go there in a social aware manner. And that's what we chose. We said, we go there and the social aware manner. So not shutting up but discussing and taking responsibility. And that's what we do. And I think that's what we will do also for future events, if there are any issues.

G: So, boycott was the option. But in the end, we said, you should be very careful with boycotting, I think, I think the only reason to boycott is a war. And maybe there are some other possibilities, but probably the war, there'll be the one and if you do the procedure well under awarding the World Cup, then you probably won't need a boycott in the future.

S: I think you answered it. Thank you so much for your time. Are you fine with me emailing over some potential follow up questions later?

G: Yes. No worries. Do that. And I'm very, very interested in in the end of your research and your conclusions.

S: Thank you.

Appendix L: Ad verbatim Transcript Interview with HNS

Interviewer (S): Shakki Bhat

Interviewee (C): Official at the Croatian Football Federation

Date: May 2nd, 2022

In Person or Remote: Remote (via email communications)

Language of Interview: English

Communications for the Croatian Football Federation (HNS/CFF).

Interview Purpose: The purpose of this interview/correspondence is to better understand what strategy the Croatian Football Federation regarding human rights prior and during the 2022 FIFA World Cup. It is also to better understand why the federation pursues strategies and initiatives related to Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) initiatives.

*Interview Questions are bolded.

S: When approaching the 2022 World Cup in Qatar, how did your organization approach human rights concerns over issues such as labor, women, and LGBTQ rights? Did this approach change from the time Qatar was first awarded the World Cup in 2010 to the months leading up to the event?

C: Croatian Football Federation is a sports organization, and therefore we are focusing on sporting matters first and foremost. In that regard, we focused on the World Cup in Qatar only after the team qualified for the event in November 2021, as we do with all the competitions where we participate.

Obviously, we were quite aware of the challenges that Qatar as a host country has in the area of human rights. Since qualifying for the event, we actively followed the situation in Qatar, communicated with FIFA, other national associations, and different NGOs in order to better understand the challenges in Qatar. We also noticed quite a visible improvement over the last few years leading up to the event. We also observed the efforts of UEFA Working Group that visited Qatar and had discussions with different stakeholders.

We have been encouraged by the fact that a lot has been done in Qatar since FIFA awarded the World Cup to Qatar, which can partly be attributed to the visibility that Qatar received because of the World Cup. We can reference to the report from the International Labor Organization:

https://www.ilo.org/global/about-the-ilo/newsroom/news/WCMS_754391/lang--en/index.html

We also have belief that hosting the World Cup, thus opening itself to the world, and different nations and cultures, was surely useful for the human rights development in the county and the whole region. That was visible from the statements of sheik Tamim Bin Hamad Al-Thani at UN General Assembly before the World Cup, where he said that Qatar will open its doors without discrimination. Those kinds of statements were a sign of progress, and we believe that World Cup delivered on that - we were not made aware of any issues that any of our fans had in regards to their human rights. On the contrary, our fans had a great experience, as did the team - we had a great World Cup, and we feel it was brilliantly organized, and we felt very welcomed, pleasant and safe during the whole event.

As a FIFA member association, HNS also closely monitored the steps that FIFA took when it comes to protecting worker rights and their safety. We believe that a lot has been done. More information can be found here:

<https://www.qatar2022.qa/en/opportunities/workers-welfare/news-reports>

Also, FIFA developed the first Sustainability Strategy for the World Cup:

<https://www.fifa.com/what-we-do/sustainability/strategy/>

First and key chapter here are workers' rights.

Croatian Football Federation dedicates special attention to social responsibility, and we are active in different projects with an aim for equal rights for all stakeholders in football. As part of the football family, we support all activities and projects of our umbrella organizations, FIFA and UEFA. Respecting human rights and diversion is in the very core of the game of football, and we look to raise awareness through different activities.

On a global level, we participate in FIFA and UEFA campaigns. For instance, our captain Luka Modrić participated in FIFA's antidiscrimination campaign and we wore official captain armbands with positive messages throughout the tournament. HNS also educated its players with key facts ahead of the tournament for them to be well informed about all these issues.

S: Were there ever discussions within the federation to boycott the event? Did your federation engage with NGOs and/or your government prior to the event to shape your policies? What role did FIFA, UEFA, and other federations play in shaping your organization's approach to the World Cup?

C: No, we did not have discussions about boycotting the event - that was not an option for us. We believe that sports is above politics, and while we understand the power of our platform, we do not want to use it for promoting political agendas. Obviously, we have been in touch with FIFA, UEFA, other national associations, and NGOs, but boycotting was never really an option. Not only for us but for other teams as well.

S: Could you please explain your organization's mission and values and the role they play in shaping the overall decisions of your federation? How does your organization balance social goals with the competitive and financial goals of your federation and what is your organization's main purpose?

C: Our main purpose is to take care, protect, promote, and develop football in Croatia, which includes three key areas - national teams, club football (competitions) and football organization in general (including good governance, social responsibility, commercial revenues, marketing, communications, stakeholder relationships etc.). Football has an extremely important and positive function in Croatian society, so just by taking care of our "core business" (developing football) we provide a lot to society in general (there are many benefits of playing football, from health perspective to economic benefits). So, more than anything, we are focused on - football.

Obviously, having such a strong platform also comes with a great responsibility, which is why we have a lot of socially responsible projects. We are a non-profit organization, so all of our revenues are invested back to football, whether it's by investing in the player development, in the infrastructure etc. In other words, our financial goals are not to "make money" but rather to invest all revenues back to football development.

S: What is your federation's reasoning for having grassroots projects engaging with groups such as veterans, disabled individuals, and children? How long have your federation's grassroots projects been going on for?

C: It goes along the above-mentioned purpose of the Federation - to foster football in the country. Most of the football is amateur, not elite, and we understand that. I don't think there is one simple reasoning behind this, but perhaps the first thing that we want to stress is that grassroots projects aren't something we're doing for PR reasons – not because we don't think that these kinds of stories can be good PR, but because, despite our efforts to publicize these stories, they don't generate nearly as much media attention as elite men's football, and they're not something that the general football public seems to place a lot of importance on. So, if we saw these projects primarily as an image management tool that's aimed at the general public, they wouldn't be serving that purpose that well, and therefore I believe we wouldn't be investing nearly as much in them as we do, in terms of both funding and human resources.

I think a rough estimate of when many of these initiatives – like projects focused on children's football or supporting sports associations for persons with disabilities – were first launched is the early 2000s. We had football for adults/veterans (35+) even before that. At that time, the terms “grassroots” or “football social responsibility” weren't as widely used or known in Croatia, and I don't think there was initially a big strategic approach behind getting involved in these kinds of projects. Instead, I believe the main driving force behind getting in on these initiatives was that they felt like the right thing to do, and also like the natural thing to do. As a football association, we do football, and therefore it felt only natural that we should also do children's football, football for adults 35+, etc., even if projects in these areas weren't necessarily financially viable in terms of generating any kind of return on investment. In addition to this, we've always been very aware of the fact that nurturing amateur football – and especially amateur children’s football – is a prerequisite for building any kind of success at an elite level. Grassroots football never felt like a particularly separate entity from professional football, we just saw it as part of the same football pyramid.

It’s also difficult to trace when exactly we began working with people with disabilities or with national minorities, which are the two marginalized groups that we’re most involved in – it feels like we’ve honestly always had partner organizations in these areas. Many of the initiatives we’re involved with were originally proposed by different NGOs that contacted us for support, but there’s also project areas – like working with refugees – where we were the ones who looked for partner organizations and where the projects came about through us approaching the end users of the project instead of the other way around.

In general, I think grassroots projects are part of our holistic approach to football, and that the reasoning behind them is the same reasoning we have behind all of our key projects, which is to try to fulfill our organizational mission of nurturing our football community, maintaining football’s position as the most popular sport in Croatia, and growing football in Croatia. We see grassroots as playing a key part in achieving that.

S: For issues related to human rights, who do you think should take the lead on improving efforts as it relates to mega-events like the World Cup? Additionally, how does your federation approach issues related to both football and politics?

C: We believe that competition organizer is always a responsible party, which means FIFA for the World Cups, UEFA for EUROs, along with their counterparts in the host country (some sort of local organizing committee). FIFA and UEFA are the ones who chose the host country, they analyze the bids, they create terms and conditions for the host country, and they are the ones who under the microscope of the media, general public, NGOs and others.

Subject of human rights was very important to FIFA, and they invested a lot of effort and resources into dealing with this matter. Since 2011, FIFA has been actively engaging with the Supreme Committee for Delivery and Legacy (SC) and key stakeholders such as the Building and Woodworkers' International (BWI) with the aim of enhancing the monitoring and enforcement mechanisms regarding labor rights on FIFA World Cup sites. FIFA and the SC not only worked to protect construction workers on FIFA World Cup sites but expanded the systems to cover other workers who become involved in the tournament preparation, such as in the hotel, transportation, logistics or security industries.

We believe that FIFA has much greater resources, both financial and human, than any individual national association, and therefore, that it should make sure that their events such as World Cups are organized at a high standard in every regard, including human rights. As a FIFA member association and participant at the World Cup, we expect FIFA to do exactly that.

Human rights challenges are not limited to Qatar - they exist everywhere in the world and, as Croatian Football Federation, we are mostly focused on solving challenges in our country, which we have more than enough.

S: How are decisions made in your organization and what is your organization's hierarchical structure? To what extent do actors like your government and private sponsors have in influencing the decisions your organization makes?

C: Executive Committee is our executive body, and they make key strategic decisions, headed by the president of the Federation. President and ExCo are chosen by the General Assembly. Obviously, there is a top management working with the President, to make operational decisions. We are not dependent on the government money, so we feel quite independent in making our decisions, where we also prefer to follow UEFA and FIFA's lead when it comes to key football matters. Private sponsors have no influence on our decisions, and they're not a part of our decision-making bodies in any capacity.

S: What were your federation's football expectations for the tournament prior to the 2022 World Cup?

C: After winning the silver medal at the World Cup 2018, we felt quite optimistic, but also realistic in that we did not have the same team as in 2018 (18 new players in the squad), with key players such as Mandžukić, Rakitić, Ćorluka, Subašić, and others no longer part of the team, as they retired from the national team football. However, with that silver medal as a confidence booster, and with the likes of Luka Modrić, Ivan Perišić, Mateo Kovačić, and other 'senators' still in the fold, we felt we have a fighting chance against everybody, as long as we have a strong team spirit and character as we did in Russia. That "family" atmosphere in the team is really important to us, and it showed on the pitch - once again, just like in Russia, we managed to win key games via penalties, which shows strong mental toughness. At the end, we were very proud of winning another medal - our third at the World Cups since gaining independence, with only Germany and France having more than three medals since 1998. That's a remarkable achievement for such a small country such as Croatia.

S: Are there any documents (in English or Croatian) I should look at regarding your organization's human rights and corporate social responsibility initiatives, including specific documents related to the World Cup in Qatar?

C: We haven't published anything particular regarding the World Cup. You can find our yearly reviews at the following link - these documents cover all of our key activities during the year, which includes some of our socially responsible projects:
